

Abstract

In a system configured with control redundancy, there are two control elements: an active control complex and an inactive control complex. An increased level of fault tolerance can be achieved when switching the activity state between complexes in the event of a critical software or hardware failure. The present invention relates to system redundancy and introduces a new method to ensure that system context is always synchronized across a switch-over process.

20100504:030102